Off-campus liaison Jeeves

Stopfunnery accepts invite to party

Over the weekend, a group of off-campus students shocked the world when they invited notorious outlaw Jeeves Stopfunnery to their booze-fueled bacchanalia. "We just figured all the man really wanted was an invitation," said junior Eric Wintergreen, "and he responded with great enthusiasm and gratitude."

Upon arriving at 783 Foster Street, Jeeves, dressed to impress in his finest golf shirt and slacks, knocked on the door. But the reception to his arrival was not what he had hoped for. "I shat myself!" said house inhabitant Stiles Clemson. "I mean, dude, it's motherfucking Jeeves Stopfunnery! People avoid that guy like the plague! I hear he actually has the plague! Come on, guys, I swear it's just coffee."

However, after intentions were disclosed and introductions were made, Jeeves proceeded to go shot-for-shot with four students, including Amanda Sherran. "It's like he had never been invited to a party his whole life," recounted Sherran. "He was just pounding shots like it was the first time his mother had let him out of the house without a chaperone. He finished most of the Somerville firewater by himself, too, which was kind of cool, I guess."

After several keg stands, shotguns, and rounds of Civil War, "Jihaddin" Jeeves Stopfunnery was what onlookers described as "tanked like a Middle Eastern village." Unfortunately, by 11:24 P.M., Jeeves was passed out on the floor next to the keg, allegedly unconscious. Residents of the house were forced to notify BCPD who, in turn, called the paramedics. Despite the humiliation, Jeeves gave a thumbs up to partygoers as he was taken in a stretcher to a waiting ambulance.

Despite the massive headache and bloody vomit that ailed Stopfunnery the next day, he reported that he was thrilled to be a part of the "first-ever usage" of the university's alcohol amnesty system. "I'm just glad to have immunity from punishment," said Stopfunnery from a hospital bed. "It really improves my chances of getting into the Ringling Brothers and Barnum & Bailey Clown College."

Stopfunnery will be staying in St. Elizabeth's for the next week, so students are advised to plan their parties accordingly. ■

Girl who "totally failed exam" literally failed the exam

Friends, roommates, and casual eavesdroppers were surprised to learn that sophomore Michaela Michaels was not in the least bit exaggerating after she actually received a failing grade on a recent midterm in her theology course, Biblical Heritage.

Following a week of obnoxious complaining, including incessant whines of 'that test destroyed me,' 'I'm so withdrawing from that class,' or simply 'I totally failed,' the exam was returned to Michaels with an encircled "F" and a "Please See Me" note underneath. Her shockingly accurate description of her sub-passing performance has been all the buzz around campus.

"I'll admit that normally when I hear someone talking like this, they got a B-. Hell, maybe even a C+, but even that's pushing it these days," said Eagle's Nest cashier Geraldino de la Cruz. "But lo and behold, she flat-out failed it. I mean, a 48? Like seriously, if the semester were to end today, Michaela wouldn't even receive credit for taking the class."

Most taken aback by the news was classmate Timmy Webster, who despite answering 'Jesus of Nazareth' for all multiple choice and most short-answer questions, still mustered a disappointing, albeit passing, 64%. "Dude, she got more questions wrong than she got right. It's sad, but still kind of hilarious."

Michaels could not be reached for comment, nor is it anticipated that she will be available at any point in the foreseeable future, as both Facebook and Twitter sources have confirmed that the sophomore will be "in O'Neill for the rest of [her] life." ■

CAMPUS HAPPENINGS

POLICE BLOTTER

October 31

11:34pm. An attempted heist of the Million Dollar Staircase was thwarted by a student in a home-made superhero costume. The meddling kid ended the criminal's dream of a big payday by informing him that "you can't steal stairs."

November 1

4:52am. Police were called to the Stokes construction site, where a man dressed in nothing but a leather jacket stood atop the roof, screaming for methamphetamine.

November 3

11:07am. Resident assistants in Walsh Hall busted a room of four students who were in the process of trading illegal flu shots. The students were detained for possession of illicit substances.

November 4

3:53pm. A geometry professor was brought into custody on charges of soliciting faculty into joining a purported tetrahedron scheme. The investigation is expected to shape up nicely as a new angle is taken on the case.

November 6

8:24am. A student was reported missing in the vicinity of South St. and Commonwealth Ave. His roommate told police that he had last seen the student going to investigate the mysterious connection between Verizon and the South St. manhole.

Arrupe mugging goes south

Two students, Brittany Parker and Chris Barrow, have been detained Sunday after an incident in the McElroy dining hall led to a student being rushed to St. Elizabeth's. The injured student, whose name has not been released, is in critical condition after the brutal attack. The police report indicates that the mugging occurred just after 6 p.m. Sunday during the dinner rush in McElroy. The victim attempted to enter the dining area but was stopped by the culprits, who were seated at a table. When he refused to make a donation to their Arrupe group, Barrow and Parker cornered the student and dragged him into the stairwell. The victim proceeded to donate the entirety of his meal plan to their service trip.

Evidence has come forward showing that this is not the first time the nefarious duo of Parker and Barrow has robbed students. As of printing, 32 meal plan robberies have been attributed to them. This revelation came during the aftermath of the beating, when local pervert Bat Masterson came forward to authorities bearing video evidence of past attacks. Masterson provided over 40 hours worth of footage of Parker, which included twenty minutes of unprovoked brutality and 2380 minutes of "close observation". This collection was apparently part of a personal investigation by Masterson. He was later called in for questioning for an unrelated incident.

When authorities searched the suspects' rooms they discovered the two to each have a disturbing obsession; Parker with infamous criminals Bonnie and Clyde, Barrow with service trips and colonoscopies. An mp3 entitled "11 Bonnie and Clyde (ft. Chris and Brittany)" was also found. It described the plan for the crime spree and featured both sugary hooks and fiery verses.

While it is currently believed that the two acted alone, authorities ask students to step up their vigilance and protect their peers from future harassment. ■

Charity walk of shame draws big support

The first annual Walk of Shame for STD Control took place last Saturday as much of the student body gathered to cheer on participants. Organizers hope that the impressive showing at the event will lead to increased awareness of a growing campus issue. "When we saw all the girls walking down Comm Ave every Sunday morning, heels in hand, we saw an unorganized pack of stray puppies, just looking for a home," said Aaron Kettlehorn, who put the event together with his roommate. "They looked like they could be easily manipulated."

Students came together in a heartwarming show of support for the walkers, with some passing out water bottles and pregnancy tests along the sidewalk, and some joining their friends on the course. All proceeds from concessions and merchandise sales will be donated to purchasing better walking shoes for campus sluts. Participants asked friends and relatives to support them with pledges as they burned off extra calories after a night of burning off extra calories. The money will be used to fund gonorrhea research on campus.

"We can't wait to find out what gonorrhea is," said an anonymous Jesuit. "What does the term mean? I have absolutely no idea what's going on down there." Families of the walkers were thrilled by the show of charity.

"I was just delighted to hear that she's turned her harlotry into such a good cause," said Edna Stevenson, whose granddaughter took part in the walk. "Back in my day, when people watched you after a tryst with a lover, they were watching you burn at the stake." The university has declared its official support for the future of the walk, stating that "every student needs a good shaming now and then." "That was so refreshing," said a noticeably exhausted walker shortly after finishing the course. "It's the most exercise I've gotten in about six hours." ■

Homeless to fill space in Student Section

ONE MAN'S DREAM TAKES FLIGHT

Given the steady decline in BC's football prowess and subsequent decline in student ticket sales, BC is thinking of once again outsourcing its student cheering section to the homeless.

"As some people may be surprised to learn, this actually isn't the first time BC has employed a largely homeless cheering section" said Duck Mallard, director of ticket sales. "Two years ago, when our team surprisingly made it into the Emerald Bowl, we anticipated that very few students would make the trip out to San Francisco. So, we created a program where we donated student tickets to the wandering homeless. It was a resounding success."

Hoads of San Fran's homeless reportedly packed the stadium. Their hand-scrawled signs alternatively read "GO EAGLES" on the front and "I'M HUNGRY" on the back. However, their cheering was not as uniform.

"Yeah, we kinda had a tough time teaching them the classic chants. Instead of 'For Boston', they seemed to insist on chanting 'For Bean-dip.' It was different from what we were used to, but, overall, we welcomed the spirit with which they sang for their bean-dip," said Mallard.

In spite of such potential mix-ups, Mallard said BC plans to offer tickets to Boston's homeless population, to be subsidized by the money saved from not putting on a fall concert.

"The funny thing is, we went from kicking the homeless out of Walsh to inviting them into Conte. It wasn't easy to rebuild a relationship with them after the whole Walsh thing. One old guy in particular, who goes only by 'Pat the Hat' really didn't trust us at all until we gave him a spare Baja Chicken sandwich we had lying around."

Pat declined to comment after we told him that he would not be compensated for his time with food.

Mallard is optimistic, however. "Who knows how far this can go? Both of our skilled football players are injured, and the next recruiting class is especially terrible. We could be seeing homeless linemen or even quarterbacks being added to our team roster. If that goes well, I might leave my job at BC to go start my dream – the Homeless Football League."

Mallard, who described himself as "in between homes," said that he would technically be qualified to play in the HFL. "I look forward to tryouts. After all this time on this side of the lines, it'd be nice to play a little ball, you know? Show 'em how high the Duck can fly." ■

Student from Greenwich, CT to study abroad in Dorchester, MA

IF YOU LOOK CLOSE ENOUGH YOU CAN SEE A WAHLBERG

This week, the Office of International Programs will announce its newest region available for students interested in studying abroad. The university will be partnering with Jeremiah E. Burke High School in Dorchester, MA to enroll one student in the initial semester of the program.

Sophomore Fangs Sycamore, Esq. made the new opportunity possible by petitioning BC to recognize the prospective program. Born and raised in Greenwich, CT, Sycamore argued that no current BC program could possibly be as unique and eye-opening as the nearby suburb. "I've been to Europe dozens of times," said Sycamore, his jaw firmly locked. "It's been so passé ever since they abolished serfdom."

Both the student and the institution are excited for the potential of the program. University officials expect it to quickly become one of the most popular destinations amongst students, possibly surpassing mighty Australia. Audrey Shale of OIP commented on the similarity of the programs, "Both Australia and Dorchester have language barriers that can be difficult to overcome at first, but once you do, there's a completely unique land to explore."

Sycamore plans to continue his business studies while abroad but will also pursue some local courses including remedial algebra. "I just can't wait to learn about my manservant's ancestral homeland," Mr. Sycamore exclaimed jubilantly. ■

THUG LIFE

2LiveCrew and the ringtone snafu

An awkward moment occurred last Thursday when “Hoochie Mama,” a hypersexual booty ballad sung by early-90s hip-hop collective 2LiveCrew, began to echo across the walls of Devlin 008. As curious students twisted their necks in hopes of finding the embarrassed culprit fumbling into the pocket of his or her jeans, Dr. Sanjay Parekh casually walked to the podium and clicked off his buzzing iPhone.

Silence seized the lecture hall as students tried to absorb certain lines like, “Foreplay our way, your way, my way, trick or freak and I hit it on Friday,” and, of course, the fact that this song was actually purchased as a ringtone by their professor. Parekh, who earned a PhD in biomedical engineering from Stanford University in 1978 and just does not seem like a guy whose “favorite time is 69,” broke the one-and-a-half-minute period of absolute silence with an ill-timed rhetorical question: “College, right?”

A total of 28 individuals were reported to have exited the lecture hall after Parekh’s initial response.

“It was really weird,” claimed Annifred Lyngstad, one of the students who left. “I was amused at first, but then I kept picturing Dr. Parekh wearing a Speedo, popping Cristal, and surrounded by half-naked women on a yacht, and that really offended me.”

Only making matters worse, Parekh returned to his discussion about the endocrine system by attributing “the gentlemen in 2LiveCrew, and [himself]” to having abnormally high testosterone levels in the early ‘90s. Upon hearing this, students departed en masse, forcing Parekh to end class twenty minutes early, with seven souls remaining.

NASTIER THAN WE WANT HIM TO BE

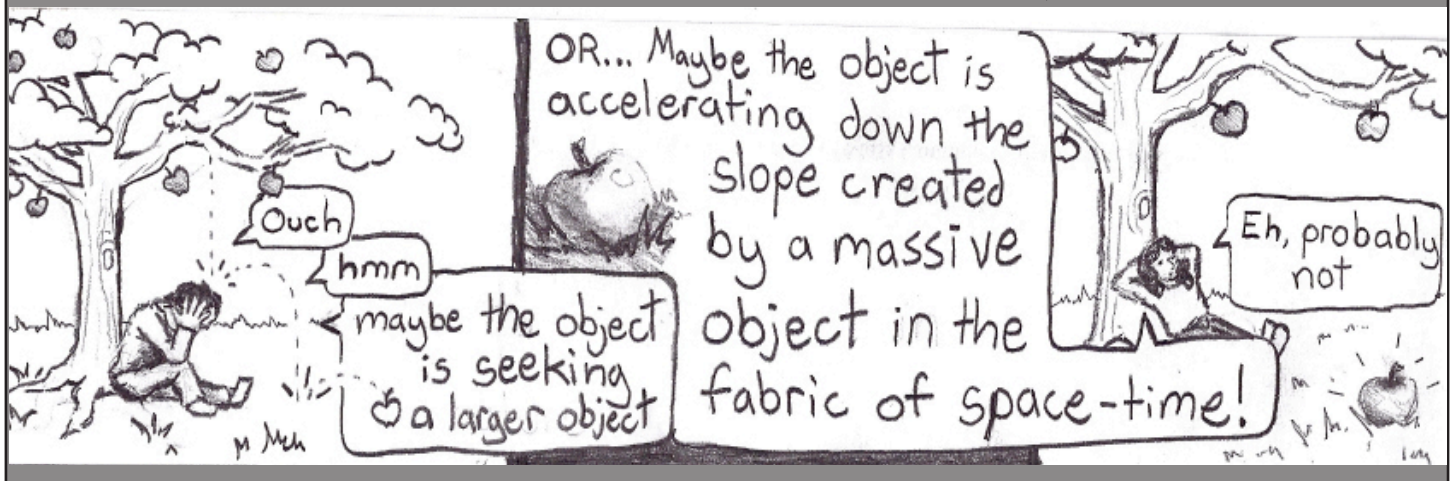

“It caught me off guard,” said student DeMaurice Plainwater. “I figured that an educated man like himself would at least have LL Cool J’s ‘Doin’ It’ as a ringtone, but apparently not.”

After class was over, Dr. Parekh shocked our reporter with the revelation that he was once featured as a dancing extra in the music video for 2LiveCrew’s legendary “Do the Bart.” Parekh went into vivid detail concerning the happenings behind the scenes of the shoot, saying, “So Brother Marquis and I were sitting on a white couch with this girl named Rumpel Mintz, and she had just cooked some angel dust, when...”*

Concerning the future of his job, Parekh declined to comment, but did assert that he “may be taking some time off to re-explore [his] lost years spent in medical school.”
